Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: .of many market samples of phenacetin Beringer (loc. cit.) found, in some cases, that the presence of about 3 or 4 per cent of acetanilid lowered the melting point of phenacetin about 3 or 4, thereby corroborating some of the results obtained in his special investigation of the melting points of known mixtures. The evidence obtained from Beringer s results, and also from those by Tingle and Roelker(3), Holleman and Sluiter(64), White(l), Ostwald(es), Landolt(20), Tyrer and Levy(25), and many others, even if not entirely convincing, certainly encourages the conclusion that the melting-point test properly applied is quite adequate to the detection, within moderately exact limits, of varying amounts of impurity, and if methods and procedure are sufficiently refined is therefore well adapted to the exact. standardization of such pharmacopoeial compounds as admit of its application. 4. The special series of experiments referred to on page 72, in connection with fineness of division, also included consideration of (a) the practice of remelting in determinations of the melting point; (b) the effect upon the melting point of variation. within narrow limits, in the amount of sample used; and (c) the effect of variation in the size of the capillary tubes. The results of many determinations upon salicylic acid led to the conclusion that the practice of remelting would, for pharmacopoeial purposes, involve complication without compensating advantage, and is therefore opposed. Other investigators have opposed the practice on the ground that it causes high results. In these experiments. however,...
